San Pedro de Atacama is a village in northern Chile dominated by the Licancabur and Sairecabur Volcanoes in the east. The area has been populated for millennia, since the Incas through to the Spanish settlers in the sixteenth century and until today. It is considered by some as the archaeological capital of the country. The structure and architecture of the city is unique. It has retained its Spanish colonial influences and the church is one of the oldest in the country and one of the most beautiful in the northern region. It was declared a national monument in 1951. Around the town are many outstanding natural sites, such as the Valley of the Moon, the Salar de Atacama, and the Tatío Geyser.
